CHEWING GUM

The history of chewing goes back thousands of years. In Sweden in 1993, the skeleton of a teenager was found, he was nine thousand years old. And in his mouth was a gum made of tree sap and sweetened with honey – the first known chewing gum.

The ancient Greeks chewed a type of tree sap, too. They thought it was good for their health and women really enjoyed chewing it as a way to sweeten their breath. In the first century AD we know that the Mayan Indians in South America liked to chew a tree sap. They wrapped it in leaves and put it in their mouths. The American Indians also chewed tree sap – they gave it to the English when they arrived in American continent.

The history of modern chewing gum begins in America in 19th century. In 1892 a clever young salesman called William Wrigley decided that chewing gum was the thing of the future. He was the first to use advertising to sell in a big way. He hired of hundreds of pretty girls, who he called ‘the Wrigley girls’. They walked up and down the streets of Chicago and New York City handing out free gum. He also had huge electric signs and billboards – one billboard was a mile long, it ran along the side of the train track. So with all this, chewing gum became very popular all over the USA.

During the Second World War American soldiers got Wrigley gum to help them relax. In 1944 all gum production went to the US Army and they took their gum overseas and gave it to children. And so the popularity of gum spread to other countries. The strangest thing about gum today is that nobody knows what it is made of. Nobody will tell you. The chewing gum industry keeps the recipe top secret.
